this is the report of the independent inquiry that looked at the government's handling of the foot and mouth epidemic of 2001 it makes the point that given the spread of the disease before its detection the impact of the outbreak was bound to be severe even if everything had been handled perfectly however there were problems and the initial response was neither fast enough nor effectively coordinated maff took the lead but came under severe resource pressure not only in the number of vets but also in the managerial and logistical skills that had to be later provided by the army because disease control policy had not been fully debated before the outbreak arguments took place whilst the disease was raging and changes were made at short notice and were poorly communicated in addition the full impact on tourism and the rural economy was not clearly recognised however in Scotland with a different management structure and closer relationships between central government local government and the farming industry the outbreak was better managed as well as analysing the conduct of the government during the epidemic the report contains a series of recommendations to help ensure that the chances of exotic animal diseases entering the country are reduced the farming industry is less vulnerable to outbreaks and that if such outbreaks do occur the impact is minimised
